Toews' father was a Mennonite living and teaching in a small Manitoba town, and in her rendering of her father's interior life Toews also explores the tensions between self and community and teases out "the complicated kindness" which makes those tensions almost bearable. Despite the father's mental illness and suicide, Swing Low is a wonderfully sane and life-affirming book.

Toews, whose 1998 novel A Boy of Good Breeding was sweet and funny and undercelebrated, tells us all this in her prologue to Swing Low. She tells of the two words he whispered to her the day before he died: Nothing accomplished. He was in the hospital then, sad and confused and silent. Now and then he'd asked his daughter to write things down for him, in the first person, to help him.
